Individuals in secure and community environments were compared on the basis of age, sex, race, number of previous admissions, number of previous hospitalizations, mental retardation, sex crime charges, referral sources, number of parents and length of hospital stay. The clinical characteristics of secure and community patients were compared to determine whether one type of placement is more likely to produce more or less favorable outcomes. Patients admitted for the first time did not differ significantly from those admitted more than once, although more admissions were significantly correlated with longer hospital stays. Patients with a history of sexual assault had longer hospital stays and the charges for community patients were less than those for patients in secure environments. As compared to other patient groups, secure patients with a history of sex crime tended to have the highest number of recent sexual assaults and the highest number of recent attempts to escape. Implications for developing alternative intervention programs are discussed.
