The focus of this dissertation is on the structure and function of brain regions in the temporal cortex that are involved in the formation of these associations. One approach is to examine the organization of the cortical areas that contain neurons involved in this process. The first experiments begin by examining the extent of the regions of the temporal cortex that contain neurons in the mammalian forebrain that have electrical and anatomical connections with neurons in the anterior cingulate cortex. These experiments show that a primary visual area in the ventral posterior lateral cortex (VPL) can be categorized as an association region because it has a stronger connection with the anterior cingulate cortex than it has with the visual areas of the posterior cortex (MT and TE). The second experiment is to determine if this association region is topographically organized in that its neurons would code for visual stimuli that are closer in space to the observer's eyes. The results from these experiments show that the neurons in VPL are not more sensitive to stimuli presented in its periphery than to those presented in its center. Since these experiments show that the neurons in VPL are not orientation sensitive, it is concluded that this region does not contain neurons
