In English.Damage to the postoperative gastrointestinal tract is one of the most common problems faced after abdominal surgery and the challenges in caring for this segment of the body that is mechanically altered, and often compromised by impaired mobility, are very significant.

The importance of a good recovery cannot be over-emphasized. This team of investigators will address the problem from a number of different but interactive perspectives and will test the concept that, in order to optimize the recovery of the gastrointestinal tract after abdominal operations, particular attention should be paid to the nutritional needs of the patient, the general health status of the patient, and the mechanical issues associated with the surgical procedure, specifically with an emphasis on devising prophylactic techniques to improve outcomes. The investigators will study nutrient requirements of patients undergoing major abdominal operations, and assess the value of a controlled nutrition regimen in the pre- and postoperative periods in reducing the incidence of complications following surgery. By means of a prospective, randomized clinical trial they will test the value of prophylactic, short-term, intravenous nutrition supplementation with a special formula that provides total parenteral nutrition during the pre- and postoperative periods. The investigators will develop a model for patient care involving special emphasis on the nutritional status of patients before surgery, pre- and post-operative nutrition support and early postoperative enteral nutrition. By using this integrated model of care, the investigators will determine whether patients receiving special nutritional support are able to better preserve their ability to recover from surgery. The investigators also will review the impact of individualized nutrition on morbidity following abdominal operations, and evaluate the impact of pre- and post-operative nutritional status on post-operative complications.MIRACLE ON 23rd STREET (A Mother's Love Story) MIRACLE ON 23rd STREET (A Mother's Love Story) An award winning film about the many mysterious and unexplained phenomena surrounding the 1856 San Francisco earthquake and the later-that-same-year infidelity of the city's Beloved and Beloved Wife.
